

Background

The City of Inman is a small, enterprising community located in the Upstate of South Carolina. It grew around the railroad connecting Spartanburg, SC to Asheville, NC. However, the community known as Inman, existed long before the railroad.

The Pardo stone was discovered in this area in 1934, which is proof that the Spanish leader Pardo led an expedition from the vicinity of Parris Island to the mountains in 1567.

Before paved roads there were Indian trails also used by traders. Two of these trails are now called Blackstock Road and Old Howard Gap Road.

Modern day Inman is gifted with a unique layout that merges both the business and residential community in a way that is unique in this age of urban sprawl.

The historic section of the city hosts its established businesses that are reminiscent of a time when cities actually had a comfortable, serene 'main street' atmosphere. In many respects, the historic area of the City of Inman reminds one of Thornton Wilder's "Our Town".
